Has made himself known to the medical profession by extensive investigations in the anatomy and surgery of the pelvis and abdomen, and has been honored by having several parts of the abdominal and pelvic anatomy named after him by his colleagues, as the "circle of Byron Robinson," and the abdominal brain, the oligemic uterine zones, and the pelvic brain of Byron Robinson are anatomic eponyms known to physicians. Is author of the theory that trauma of the psoas muscle on the appendix produces appendicitis. The damage caused by the violent contraction of the psoas muscle on the appendix produces a plastic peritonitis which gradually contracts, producing flexion of the appendix that compromises the appendicular circulation nourishment and abstracts drainage, ending in appendicular catarrh or perforation. Author of Landmarks of Gynecology (2 vols.); Practical Intestinal Surgery (2 vols.); Automatic Menstrual Ganglia; Urachal Cysts; The Abdominal Brain, Its Rhythm and Reflexes; a work on the Peritoneum; also monographs on the Great Omentum, on Colpo-Perineorrhaphy, and on the Utero-ovarian Artery, and a life-sized chart on the Sympathetic Nerve; has contributed very extensively on abdominal anatomy and surgery to current medical literature. Ohio Univ., B.A., 1849; later A.M., same; graduate West Point, 1853; m. 1884, Josephine Hartwell; children: Charles Sooy Smith, Gerald Sooy Smith. Appointed 2d lieutenant, 3d artillery, U. S. A.; promoted 2d lieutenant, 2d artillery; stationed in New Mexico; tiring of inaction of military life at frontier post in time of peace, resigned; went to Chicago, 1854; entered engineering service of I. C. R. R. Co.; soon afterward appointed asst. engineer to Col. Graham, U. S. engineer in charge of improvements of Lake Michigan harbors; had to quit because of dangerous illness; conducted select school at Buffalo, N. Y., 1855-1857; practiced as civil engineer, 1857-9; chief engineer of company building iron bridge across Savannah River for Savannah & Charleston R. R. Co., 1860-1; served as lieutenant, colonel and brig.-gen., U. S. A., from Apr., 1861, to Sept., 1864, when resigned because totally disabled by inflammatory rheumatism. When sufficiently recovered, resumed practice as civil engineer at Chicago. Has since done much difficult work as engineer and contractor for U. S. Government and railway companies, including reconstruction of Waugoshanee Light House at western entrance of Straits of Mackinac, on submerged reef of rocks 2 miles from shore; built first all-steel railroad bridge in world (Glasgow, Mo.), and substructures of 6 other bridges, by pneumatic process, which developed and greatly improved; with son, Charles Sooy Smith, introduced into this country the freezing process for difficult subaqueous work, and sank 2 shafts through quicksands and boulders, to depth of 100 feet, which could not have been put down by any other known method. Has completely changed methods of constructing foundations for heavy buildings in Chicago; carrying the loads down through mud and soft earth to hard bottom, 50 feet or more, by means of piles cut off below water surface, and where these could not be driven without endangering foundations of adjacent buildings, by sinking columns of concrete to hard bottom and resting the buildings on them; has aided in development of plans of high steel buildings in Chicago and throughout the world, and was foremost in urging U. S. Government to create board to test Am. metals and appropriate money to make such tests; was mem. of board so created during the 3 years of its existence. Frequently employed as consulting engineer on difficult problems and works. Office: Monadnock Blk. Residence: Riverside, Ill.
